

What Happens After Your Self-Pay Patients Leave?

While a patient may not have had Medicaid coverage on the date of their original encounter, many times that same patient can go on to receive full Medicaid benefits long after their initial visit.

If a self-pay or sliding fee patient receives full Medicaid benefits at any point within timely filing, it potentially makes their original encounter eligible for Retroactive Medicaid reimbursement. Depending on the state and the payer, many times these encounters can be retro-reimbursed up to 12 months after the fact.

Unfortunately, the task of tracking thousands of historic self-pay encounters on a daily basis, to determine Medicaid eligibility, is not only cost-prohibitive, it's virtually impossible. As a result, many perfectly good retro-billable opportunities will go unnoticed and expire beyond their respective timely filing periods.

Retroactive Medicaid Tracking

RetroCAID® is a passive system that monitors all of your Self-Pay and Sliding Fee encounters for the full length of their respective timely filing periods. If an encounter becomes eligible for Retroactive Medicaid reimbursement at any time within timely filing, your facility is immediately alerted and provided with all of the pertinent billing information required for reimbursement.
